Early Life and Education

Constance Baker was born on September 14, 1921, in New Haven, Connecticut. Her parents, a milliner and a Pullman porter, instilled in her a strong sense of self-reliance and determination.

After graduating from high school at the top of her class, Motley pursued her undergraduate degree at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee. There, she excelled academically and became actively involved in the NAACP youth chapter.

Motley's passion for justice led her to Columbia Law School, where she faced discrimination as one of the few African American students. Despite the challenges, she remained indomitable, earning her law degree in 1946.

Legal Career

Upon graduation, Motley returned to her hometown of New York City and joined the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund (LDF). As an attorney for the LDF, she quickly gained recognition for her exceptional legal skills and unwavering commitment to equality.

One of Motley's most significant victories came in 1951 when she successfully argued the case of Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka before the Supreme Court. This landmark ruling overturned the "separate but equal" doctrine and declared racial segregation in public schools unconstitutional.

Over the next two decades, Motley continued to play a pivotal role in the civil rights movement. She represented plaintiffs in numerous desegregation cases, challenging discriminatory practices in schools, transportation, and housing. Her legal acumen and courtroom demeanor earned her the respect of judges and adversaries alike.

Political Career

In 1964, Motley made history when she became the first African American woman elected to the New York State Senate. She served in the Senate for six years, championing legislation that addressed issues of housing, education, and civil rights.

In 1976, President Gerald Ford appointed Motley to the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. She became the first African American woman to serve as a federal judge and held this position with distinction for over two decades.

Legacy

Constance Baker Motley's contributions to the American civil rights movement are immeasurable. Her legal victories helped to dismantle the structures of racial discrimination and paved the way for a more just and equitable society.

Beyond her courtroom triumphs, Motley dedicated her life to community service and mentoring. She served on numerous boards and organizations dedicated to social justice and educational opportunities.
